Clueless Victims

from Katherine Timpf at National Review, The Golden Globes Are Why Donald Trump Is Not Going Anywhere

> Streep actually had the nerve and naiveté to begin her speech by whining about how Hollywood is one of "the most vilified segments in American society right now" — all while wearing a gown that probably costs more than all of the clothing in an average American's closet combined. I'm not saying that it's impossible to be rich and miserable; what I am saying is if I am ever worth tens of millions of dollars and I still use my time in a public speech to complain about how victimized I am, please do me a favor and punch me in the face. People may be mean to you on the Internet, and that may be a bummer, but I can assure you that no one waking up at 5 a.m. to shovel coal from a mine or facing a day full of soul-crushing number-crunching interrupted only by a 20-minute break to eat a turkey sandwich on bread that may not even be organic wants to hear it. Streep said that people should be grateful for the Hollywood elite because without them they'd "have nothing to watch but football and mixed martial arts" — because apparently she's too trapped in her bubble to realize that those are both things that many people very much enjoy.

They are truly clueless victims. They are a victim of their own bubble. If they had any true introspection they would ask what happened and try to understand. Instead they keep digging their hole.
